Today's Wall Street Journal, in advance of the President's speech tonight regarding policy towards the war in Afghanistan profiles Kokomo, IN:

With a 22-year-old son serving in Afghanistan, Denise Young knows what she wants to hear President Barack Obama tell the nation Tuesday night.

"That he is going to let the generals make the decisions," Mrs. Young said. "They have asked for more troops. They should get them. There is safety in numbers."

Her sentiment echoes throughout this farm-and-factory city of about 46,000, where thousands of families are connected to the military - and some have paid the ultimate price.

Although Indiana is only the 16th most populous state, it counts the fourth-highest number of people serving in the military, said Bob Ladd, the state commander of the Disabled American Veterans of Indiana

Read the article in its entirety HERE .