The Indianapolis Star editorializes today that Congressman Pence needs to be at the forefront in bringing reform and revival to the Republican Party:

*Mike Pence has gained a leadership position in part because he's media-savvy and well-spoken. But his emergence could prove to be far more valuable than articulating partisan points if he champions reform within the GOP and in Congress as a whole.*And, Congressman Pence is referred to as a "compass for Republicans" by the Richmond Palladium-Item in today's editorial :

But Pence is an excellent choice to run the House Republican Conference, which coordinates the party's communication with the public. The congressman is articulate and committed to the conservative message.

We're convinced he'll do an outstanding job of conveying it to GOP House members whose task will be sharing it with and carrying it to the public.
