

Today's Wall Street Journal reports that recent town hall meetings suggest a national sentiment that touches on much more than just the current health care debate:

At August's town-hall meetings, voters often started with complaints about health care, only to shift to frustrations about all the other things President Barack Obama and the Democrats have done or tried to do since January. The $787 billion economic-stimulus package, the government-led rescue of General Motors Corp. and climate-change legislation all came in for criticism.

Congressman Pence has experienced similar sentiments at the four town halls he has already held (he will hold three more this week) with constituents calling the latest proposals the "last straw" in a long line of government interventions.
